

Dear Drunk People,

You're welcome. This year, I along with my co-captain Alex Sapp, have kept you safe, and made sure you woke up in the right bed. Sober patrol may be a thankless job, but after three years each on sober patrol, and more hours patrolling than any other members of college, Alex and I are committed to facilitating drunken hijinks one last time.

As co-captains this year, Alex and I have made significant improvements to the operations of sober patrol. We worked with the heads team to improve communication and accessibility, and finally started providing access to basic first aid equipment during events. We've also worked closely with the Dean's office to negotiate a host of new and exciting benefits for sober patrol next year (think Strachan meals and guest spots!).

But we're not done yet! We're hoping to expand our first aid equipment beyond the basics next year, and establish an easily found first aid station at every event. We also want to start work early, to make sure that every member of college knows that sober patrollers are here to help, and have no interest in getting you or your wasted friends in trouble!!

So, if you can remember, think back to that time I helped carry your friend home, washed your vomit off my shoes, or packed your bag for the hospital. If you were too drunk to say thank you then, you can say it now.

David Oliver
